

Black Lives Matter's development was born in 2013 after his murder was cleared of the man who shot and slaughtered an unarmed black youth, Trayvon Martin. A Californian dissident, Alicia Garza, responded on Facebook to the jury's decision with a comment that finished: "Black people. I love you. I adore them. Our lives matter." The hashtag was born and continued to develop with every fresh event and dissent in noticeable quality.

Today's people can enhance their presence by listening with an open mind and heart to the organization (Black Lives Matter), rather than just listening specifically to the components that individuals need to challenge. Individuals decide to focus on just one piece of the study which might be an adverse explanation about themselves. If individuals are really interested in real change, developing their view is the most important progress that a person can create in their lives. To tell the truth, one can argue that the precursor to even desiring to see change occur is being accessible to develop their ideas. But the most important part of active listening is fighting the human inclination by being protective to respond to the social criticisms of someone.

The growth of Black Lives Matter is about affirming that every black person who interacts with the police is an amazing, upstanding person. It is about accepting those senseless murders and excessive force is incorrect, and there is no doubt that one network should not be involved. The responsibility for fair treatment is some part of what makes America amazing. If someone does something wrong, they should face the results of the law before a preliminary occurs and not broken bones or bodily wounds. The fastest way to prevent finding yourself aligned with bigots is to de-program your mind from seeing suspects as evil criminals with irretrievable souls. This is another way of improving the organization's presence in America.

Awareness of partial social ills is an amazing beginning. The most perfect strategy to start is to find out who your local leaders are and ask them a fundamental question: "What is your policy to end the violence of the police?" Either you will have a substantive argument with a genuinely extraordinary individual about how to make a change, or you will be ignored or given a surprisingly insulting or indirect answer that will let you know everything you need to think about your responsibility to address this problem. As a voter, that legislator should work for your vote and you should not be afraid to help him remember that. In short, another way to improve the presence of the organization in America is to make this an issue of voting in their region.

Work Cited

Maloney, Alli "When police turn violent, activists Brittany Packnett and Johnetta Elzie push back". The New York Times. Women in the World, 2015.