

The development of civil rights was one of the important features of the 20th century. It was a significant step forward for justice for all African Americans living in the US. Numerous associations have organized non-violent exhibitions to highlight explicit differences, while people have also freely tested unjustifiable laws. This development has inevitably achieved equal legalization of rights, but not without difficulty. These problems persisted in the following decades, and the possibility of true unity remained slippery even in the 21st century.

After the civil war, education was one of the serious problems for African American doubts. Because they faced difficulties in obtaining affirmations, either because of economic environments or regarding schools and colleges. Each of these subconscious-driven, blacklisted, and sit-ins developments affected them. The cheats were captured for their silent disagreements; however, they continued their battle. These challenges began with one city and spread across sixty-nine urban communities across the nation, which was very convincing. HBCUs have begun to help the informative needs of Black Americans. As I would understand it as the HBCU context, I would say that my experience in Morgan State University was very good with regard to the education given to me, as well as my individual friends who were considering it here, and as a whole, we offer a similar idea and a look at MSU.

Civil Right Fights have contributed in a convincing, right way where it was wrong to prepare for us to get the education and any knowledge, as well as the ability to pick up information that whites can pick up, even if it's worse. I have raised a lot of knowledge about how life is from MSU, and I thank those who fought for justice in the light of the fact that without them, without their voice-hearing that we can still have substantial isolation in our society's school frameworks.

Along these lines, the history of civil rights demonstrates that individuals must fight equality. People who hold breakthrough positions in the public arena are unlikely to start with approaches that would improve the situation in defended networks. HBCU history, therefore, shows that the benefits of engaging in community exercises are preferred. That is why I intend to use the learning and skills I have acquired at MSU to support the distrusted privileges of US networks.
