

The documentary named 'Eyes on the Prize' discusses the historical context of the development of civil rights in America. It centers around the denied privileges of African Americans. It also explains the difficulties and conditions of raising the voice against abuse in the United States. He has discussed the period from 1954 to 1980. It starts from the homicide of Emmett Till and ends in the mid-1980s when Harold Washington was chosen as the main leader of the black city of Washington. In the narrative, each of the associations and crusades that appeared has also been examined in detail.

In recent times, the black communal has been extremely developed in a movement called "Black Lives Matter". It is a protest that was framed to fight against what has been considered as the severity of the police towards the black network, particularly young people. Before the campaign, there were situations in which numerous black and unarmed young men were shot somewhere near the police in a demonstration that was allegedly racially motivated. It is a type of development of social freedoms that occurred in many urban communities in the US.

There is an immediate connection between the development of civil rights and, in addition, the development of Black Lives Matter that has been presented in the documentary "Eyes on the Prize". Both fight for the privileges of the black network and worry about equality under the firm eye of the law for all Americans. Both movements have been instrumental in ensuring that there is an adjustment in the general public and that the black network receives the kind of consideration it deserves. The main distinction is that in the current era, online networks have been used to a large extent by the development of individuals to call the police in what they believe is unreasonable treatment.

President Obama was the leading African-American president of all time. In this way, racial isolation is not a similar problem as it was in the 20th century. Be that as it may, with the emergence of the Trump period, numerous global reports are being redirected by their approaches to racial oppression. In addition, patriotism and segregation have increased while Trump is in charge. As an ongoing review indicates, the dimension of contempt and bias has expanded since Trump's time and must be addressed. Another report showed the results that sixty-four percent of Americans accept that race is the most serious problem in the United States. In this line, these problems must be addressed in this time of innovation of the 21st century.
