

I believe black colleges have given young Americans protected and open learning opportunities where they can develop, cooperate and help each other. College students gain a sense of network and culture in these schools and believe that it is easy to adapt only to students at different colleges. They are given equal opportunities to flourish and are not oppressed. Acceptance of each other makes them an open door for self-improvement and modernization. The school determines pupils' values and abilities to thrive independently of their racial basis, while at the same time giving them a strong training base for their future.

HBCU was significant in my life and was given another opportunity at any time; In any case, I'll take it again. I have received strong training. My experiences have been moving to leave me to realize that this is my life and I should be the best in what I need to do in life to continue with a decent life or just a real existence that I need for myself and my family. This period of education can last a lot in everyday life and if you use it in the right way and considering, help some of the others along the way as our descendants have.

It is clear from the documentary that segregation was strong to the point that many juvenile children hated the black race without enough explanation behind them. This means that immorality has been passed from age to age, and hatred has ranged from more established individuals to youngsters. The fight against civil rights during the movement helped the world and everyone to understand the troubles of African Americans. Over time, individuals had the opportunity to understand that there were no compelling reasons not to argue about themselves because of the shade of their skin, and so the African Americans changed.

However, as schools are disaggregated, it offers fewer opportunities to indicate enthusiasm and care towards students. In addition, the ethnic and social history of one's own is not included in an incorporated and "equivalent" society. This gives more importance to the current HBCU, as it provides an alternative domain, educators who care and more openings for minorities. Because of the people who fought for our social freedoms in the study hall years ago, we can now develop those rights with HBCU.

Work Cited

Freeman, Kassie & Gail E, Thomas. Black Colleges and College Choice: Characteristics of Students Who Choose HBCUs. The Review of Higher Education. 2002.

Bond, Julian. Eyes on the Prize: Documentary Movie. PBS Videos. Directed by Henry Hampton. United States.1987.